2023 ~ "The story goes that Frenchman Louis Mel was instrumental in obtaining vine cuttings from the famous Sauternes producer Château d'Yquem generations ago. Our first look at this label suggests it has a certain savoir-faire, even elegance, that makes it more interesting than many entry level Marlborough sauvignon labels. The fragrant grassy, grapefruit notes are perfectly embedded in a juicy, watery, wet cement character that underlines the palate through the finish. It is a perfect summer sipper for West Coast seafood dishes..." - Anthony Gismondi - Gismondi on Wine, Jan/2025

OTHER INFO

Sustainability Spotlight: Wente took on what is the elephant in the room for the industry worldwide: packaging. 'Packaging accounts for 30% to 40% of a wine's carbon footprint,' Aly Wente says. Addressing this issue, Wente Vineyards has lightened the (empty) bottle for its widely distributed Louis Mel Sauvignon Blanc to just 405 grams. Most bottles weigh in at about 500g and many run up to 900g, if not more. Wente calls the initiative 'losing weight on purpose'. (Decanter, Aug/2022)

A French emigrant, Louis Mel travelled the western United States in the 1870's seeking a place to make wines to rival the great French Crus. He found the ideal home in the Livermore Valley. Acquiring Sauvignon Blanc and Semillon cuttings from the Marquis de Lur-Saluces, owner of the famed Chateau Y'quem, he planted them in his vineyards. The Wente family acquired the Louis Mel estate in the 1930's, where the descendants of these vines, located in the southern Livermore Valley, live in gravel and loam soils similar to the terroir of their native Bordeaux. This Sauvignon Blanc comes from various vineyards across the Livermore Valley. The different microclimates add complexity to the fruit forward style of this wine. All of the vineyards are sustainably farmed and harvested at a relatively low sugar level to retain the natural acidity. The grapes were cold fermented in stainless steel tanks to retain their natural vibrancy. Aged in stainless steel tanks.
